By implementing the Child Protection Ordinance, we aim to create a safer environment for our children, shielding them from harm and ensuring their right to education.

“Unfortunately, her dreams were shattered as her husband turned violent and abusive. He would come home late at night, intoxicated, and physically harm her. Adding to her distress...”
We are thrilled to announce that the local government has successfully passed the long-awaited ordinance on Child Protection in Namayingo District. This landmark achievement marks a crucial step forward in safeguarding our community’s most precious asset: our children.

One key importance of this ordinance lies in its potential to combat heinous activities, such as night fundraising, that have plagued our district. These illicit practices have not only endangered the well-being of our children but have also led to devastating consequences, including defilement and high dropout rates in schools.

By implementing the Child Protection Ordinance, we aim to create a safer environment for our children, shielding them from harm and ensuring their right to education. This comprehensive legislation addresses the loopholes in our existing system and provides a robust framework for reporting, investigating, and prosecuting child abuse cases.

Together, let us embrace this pivotal moment and work hand in hand to enforce the Child Protection Ordinance. We believe that every child deserves to grow up in a nurturing and secure environment, free from exploitation and fear. The passing of this ordinance reflects our unwavering commitment to their well-being and promises a brighter future for generations to come.
We were thrilled to receive incredible news at MIFUMI Health Center in Uganda. The Ministry of Health Uganda generously supported us, bringing a positive impact to our health center and the community we serve. Our mission of providing exceptional care to expectant mothers and newborns faced a major challenge – the lack of reliable electricity.

Nightfall would cast its dark veil upon our maternity department, leaving our midwives to rely on the faint glow of mobile phone torches during childbirth. It was a makeshift solution with risks of dropped phones and infections. But our prayers were answered when the Ministry of Health Uganda provided a comprehensive solar installation package. This gift transformed our maternity department, illuminating every corner and bringing a newfound sense of safety and security.

The solar system also included advanced equipment like a fetal Doppler, headlamps, and a temperature gun with rechargeable batteries. These resources revolutionized our practices, allowing us to monitor fetal health, perform surgical procedures with enhanced precision, and accurately measure temperature levels. We express our deepest appreciation to the Ministry of Health Uganda for their unwavering support, recognizing the challenges we face in our remote location.

With this newfound light and ongoing support, we are committed to continuing our mission of providing exceptional healthcare to our community. The Ministry’s generosity has empowered us to reach greater heights and extend our care to more individuals in MIFUMI village. We are filled with renewed determination and gratitude as we pledge to nurture and safeguard the lives of the women and children we serve. Thank you, Ministry of Health Uganda, for igniting a ray of hope in our hearts.
Chebet’s journey to success was filled with challenges and hardships, but her determination and resilience helped her overcome every obstacle that came her way. When she got married, her husband, who was also an athlete, fell into a destructive pattern of drinking. Despite warnings from others, Chebet hoped for a better future with him.

Unfortunately, her dreams were shattered as her husband turned violent and abusive. He would come home late at night, intoxicated, and physically harm her. Adding to her distress, he made it clear that he would only support her if she gave birth to a baby boy, leaving her uncertain about her future.

Chebet’s upbringing had already been difficult, as she grew up in a broken family with separated parents. The financial burden of education forced her to pursue athletics, but even that didn’t bring her the stability she longed for. Eventually, she joined UWA (Uganda Women’s Athletics), where she met another athlete who expressed interest in marrying her. Believing that marriage would provide the security she sought, Chebet accepted his proposal.

However, her new marriage proved to be equally challenging. Struggling as a single parent with limited resources, Chebet felt overwhelmed and disheartened. It was during this time that she discovered a glimmer of hope through the Kapseke Tailoring MIFUMI Survivors Group. This group consisted of eight women who had all faced similar situations—marriage followed by separation or abandonment.

Under the guidance of MIFUMI, the group received training in tailoring. The organization not only provided them with practical skills but also offered support and encouragement. They even supplied the materials necessary for the women to create their own clothing, which they could sell to support themselves and their children. Chebet embraced this opportunity and honed her tailoring skills, enabling her to generate income for her family.

Furthermore, the group discussions and mentorship sessions organized by MIFUMI had a profound impact on Chebet. The champions of the group, who had experienced marriage and subsequent return to their families, shared their stories and provided valuable advice. Inspired by their guidance, Chebet became passionate about raising awareness on important issues such as child marriage, child abuse, and the dangers of female genital mutilation (FGM). She also felt compelled to address the challenges faced by parents who struggle to provide for their children’s basic needs.

Now equipped with the knowledge and skills acquired through MIFUMI, Chebet not only sews and sells clothes to sustain herself and her child, but she also actively advises and supports others who face similar difficulties. Drawing from her own experiences, she serves as a source of inspiration and offers practical guidance to those in need. Chebet has transformed her hardships into a platform for advocacy, championing the rights of women and children in her community.

With every stitch she sews and every word of advice she imparts, Chebet stands tall as a symbol of resilience and empowerment. Her success story resonates not only with those who have faced adversity but with anyone striving to overcome challenges and create a better future for themselves and their loved ones.

Samantha Osinde Adikini, 55, is a woman rights activist and matron of MIFUMI shelter for domestic violence survivors in Tororo district. Her conviction stems from an abusive marriage and unpleasant childhood experience where her mother locked her and two siblings in the house and set it on fire. Adikini narrated her story to RITA MUKASA.

DAD DABBED OUR MOTHER

Adikini was born to the late Jack Osinde and Alice Lweta, a banker who later became a tailor.

Lweta was a town clerk in Mibye and Migino districts, before working with food and beverages in the 1970s. He had 17 children with different women. Lweta had four with him.

Adikini recalled that she grew up in a hostile home, owing to her violent father who would return home drunk and beat up their mother for no reason.

With time, her mother stilled a mental breakdown. When Adikini was about a year old, her mother locked her and her two siblings (two and three years old) in the house and set it on fire.

They lived in Nanyiru quarters in Kampala at the time. "The neighbours who heard us cry broke the locks and rescued us", she says.

The family lost everything and the incident made news. After talking to the house, their pregnant mother disappeared to her parents' houses in Mibye district and she later got married. She resurfaced when Adikini was seven years old. She attempted to kidnap her and her brothers and siblings from school, but she was arrested.

For some years, Adikini and her siblings lived with their single father.

"Dad later on married our stepmother, Yetusia Nyanjol Omide, who raised us as her biological children. We never missed our mother," she says.

Adikini says she treasures Nyanjol so much because she is what she is because of her. Her father died in 1977 and her mother in 1996.

Adikini attended Rock View Primary School and Kokwe Girls in Tororo district for her primary education, before moving to Rock High School for her O-Level between 1982 and 1986. After, she acquired a certificate in secretarial studies from Uganda College of Commerce (UCC) in 1989. Upon graduation, Adikini worked as secretary for Uganda Savings and Credit Cooperative Credit and Association and later, at St Stephen's Academy in Tororo district.

Along the way, Adikini courted a man hoping that the relationship would lead to marriage. However, when she conceived, he abandoned her. She tried to pursue him, but he was elusive. She would later learn that he was married. His wife attempted to kill Adikini's baby.

One day, she decided to take her baby for naming, but on reaching the man's house, his wife locked her, Adikini and their baby inside the house and set fire around them. His brother rescued them.

"I gave up on that man and decided to take care of my son," she says.

Years later, Adikini met another man with whom they cohabited. She later had four children with him, but the marriage was toxic. At that time, she was working as a secretary.

Her husband was violent. Every month, he ordered her to hand over her salary yet he did not provide for the family. Even when she refused, he would batter her.

She was always running injuries that he inflicted on her.

"One day, he beat me when I was seven months pregnant. I bled and passed out. I feared to report them to Police," she says.

She fled to the MIFUMI shelter.

"I also saved money and built a decent house in his village, but he razed it down and refused to move," she adds.

Adikini bravely left an abusive marriage for years, until she decided to walk away and raise her five children single-handedly. Her last born was two years then and is now 26 years old.

LIGHT AT THE END OF THE TUNNEL

When Adikini separated with her husband, she grappled with depression, but luckily, around that time, she was recruited as secretary for MIFUMI welfare group and later as independent domestic violence advisor.

MIFUMI is a women's rights organisation operating at the grassroots community.

They offer support services for survivors of violence and abuse through their advice centres and shelters.

Adikini is currently a Tororo shelter manager, councillor and self-defence and gender-based violence activist.

"I love helping women because I know how it feels to be abused. I also enjoy seeing them happy with their families," she says.

"Our shelter offers battered and abused women a safe space to sit and reflect ourselves in order for them to make informed decisions," she explains.

"By the time they move out, they have overcome the trauma they had been through."

Adikini says they receive several cases, both educated and illiterate who are suffering in the hands of abusive men. They also handle defilement, rape and other cases.

For example, recently, she received a case of a married man who impregnated a secondary and her teenage daughter. The mother and daughter could see eye to eye.

"We brought the mother and daughter into the shelter, but they were fighting all the time. Counselling helped to calm them down," she says.

They looked for the girl's father and resettled her.

Adikini adds that victims of domestic violence are referred to the shelter from the advice centres, Police and non-governmental organisations.

"Some cases are more than others. We record their details, notify Police and take them to hospital," she added.

The details include their names, age, number of children, location and age. They also record the details of the perpetrator and nature of the case.

Others are admitted and continually counseled as they are given skills, such as cooking, tailoring, making sanitary pads and liquid soap. They also learn how to start their own small businesses, such as by the time they leave, they can practice vegetable growing. They also learn housekeeping.

"A survivor can stay at the shelter for weeks until their case is being handled. If she is no longer safe in her home, we resettle her to her relatives or friends, until the situation improves."

Adikini says many survivors choose to go back to their homes fearing to separate with their children or lose the investments they contributed to.

In addition, bridge money is another pull factor. Much as bridge money was given in Uganda, some women still demand it upon separation.

Therefore, women decide to stay in toxic marriages because their poor parents cannot refund the bridge money.

On August 6, 2015, in a 4-1 majority decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the practice of requiring the refund of the bridge money on dissolution of customary marriage violates the country's Constitution.
55-YEAR-OLD GOES TO SCHOOL

By Ritea Mukasa

To Ericisa Mufungiza, it is never too late for anyone to go back to school and pursue their dreams. At 55 years, the resident of Kavasuma village in Bulamagi sub-county, Iganga district, decided to resume school 30 years after she dropped out. Mufungiza says a does no matter that he is old enough to be a grandfather or a father of nine adult children. He also enjoys a blissful marriage with his two wives.

In school, teachers and student christened him ‘student answerer’ (as old student), but that, too, did not deter him. He is focusing on his dream of becoming a lawyer and politician.

Last year, Mufungiza sat for his O’Level exams at Bulamagi Community Secondary School and passed in third grade. He is currently saving for school fees to see him through A’level and university.

Mufungiza was born to Kamanyiti Nahyoto, a housewife, and Edrisa Mufungiza, a former parish chief. They are both residents of Kavasuma village in Iganga district.

“I WAS A VIOLENT HUSBAND”

Mufungiza was inspired to go back to school after he became a trained activist (championed with MIFUMI), a women’s rights organization working at the grassroots throughout the country. He joined the organization three years ago, after he had been looking for avenues through which he could help impact the lives of marginalized people.

“I believe that knowledge is power. I am passionate about eliminating sex and gender-based violence, which leads to loss of lives and trauma.” He says domestic violence cases are high in his sub-county owing to high levels of illiteracy, poverty, and cultural beliefs that hold women in an inferior position.

“I was also violent and abusive to my wife. I would beat them up in front of our children for no reason,” he says.

“Husbands constantly preached against domestic violence in the village, but I remained silent for years,” he adds.

However, when he became an activist, Mufungiza started sensitizing communities about all forms of violence, including emotional, economic and domestic.

He also works hand in hand with local leaders and Police. He travels 27 villages while settling family disputes and helping victims of domestic violence to get justice.

Meanwhile, in the course of exercising his duties, Mufungiza encountered challenges with interpreting the law, in order to help victims and fight human rights violations.

He could barely read or write well.

“Local council committees would consult me on how to handle the different cases they received. I would also visit health centers, Police stations, and courts of law while following up on cases,” he says, adding, “All that needs some level of education, which I lacked.”

GOING BACK TO SCHOOL

Mufungiza grew up with 13 siblings. He says his father strived to educate his children, but could not afford to see all of them through school. In 1990, Mufungiza sat for his Primary Leaving Examinations (PLE) and failed. He repeated the class in 1991 with his three siblings. They all passed, but then father asked them to stop at that level and gave a chance to their younger siblings to complete primary school.

That is how he dropped out of school, feeling of his dream to become a doctor.

At 15 years old, Mufungiza started working with his father in Kavasuma cooperative society. He would later become secretary and at 20 years old, he married his first wife.

“Denied from membership from my sector, I was handicapped and disadvantaged, but missed several opportunities owing to my level of education,” he says.

In addition, he applied for office jobs, but was dropped because he did not have the minimum qualification of Senior Four. Past few years 30 years, he decided to go back to school in Senior One. He was supported financially and he enrolled at Fort Portal SSS, which was a few kilometres from his home. He had held the co-operative and worked as a builder.

“I enjoyed school because I was a unique student; teachers gave me attention, and, luckily, the students, too, respected me,” he says.

Mufungiza adds that he had left his job at the school administration for them to attend classes and feel the students, too, respect me,” he says.

Mufungiza adds that he had left his job at the school administration for him to attend classes and feel comfortable attending classes.

“At first, I was slow at writing because I did not learn much of the spellings. I would copy from my teacher’s notes,” he adds. With time, he copied and made it to Senior Four.
DOMESTIC VIOLENCE VICTIMS SHARE THEIR STORIES

WHAT LEADERS, EXPERTS SAY

ISA KAGGWYA
COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT OFFICER (CDO)
MUGOYE SUB-DISTRICT, KALANGALA DISTRICT

We register over 30 cases of domestic violence per month. Divorce is also rampant owing to the fishing community where many men live recklessly, but grassroots and advice centres are helping a great deal. We also have many foreigners from Rwanda, Burundi and South Sudan who come to work. Some are runaway criminals.

ALEX CHESHARI, THE SUB-DISTRICT CHIEF CHEPMWIWA, BUKWO DISTRICT

We used to receive several cases of assault, denial of property and abuse of women's rights by men. Rape, defilement and early marriages were also common, but they have reduced, thanks to the champions who are spread across villages and the advice centre. They also address alcoholism, female genital mutilation and family neglect. They help victims get justice.

EMMANUEL KANESI
SGBV SOCIAL WORKER IN KALANGALA

We conduct preventive and response interventions to curb domestic violence. For example, we do community awareness and handle cases at Police and court. We collect evidence, as well as offer psychosocial support. Many victims fear court so we hold their hands and see them through the process.

FRANCIS ODAMULIRA WALUSIMBI
RESPONSE CHAMPION

I am a tailor in Beta village, Kalangala district. I am a transformed husband. I used to beat up my wife and neglect my family, but one day a champion intervened and counselled me. I was also inspired to become one, I record cases and do mediation with the local council or refer to the advice centre those that need Police and court intervention.

Osinde's husband was violent. Every month he ordered her to hand over her salary

By RITA MUGALWA

Experts warn that violence against women can cause long-term physical and psychological harm to the women involved, their children and communities. However, because the situation does not come easily, sometimes some women have achieved it and turned into survivors in their communities.

HE BROKE MY ATHLETICS DREAM

Gloria Cherep, 22, is an athlete. Since her childhood, she hoped to make a mark on the international scene like a gold medalist. She had roles models to look up to, some from her village in Mubende and some in Namwera district. In 2018, after her O’levels, Cherep sent her way and she made it. She was recruited by the Uganda Wildlife Authority (UWA) team and her family blessed. Cherep’s parents had separated because of domestic violence, leaving her and her three siblings under the care of her mother, a tailor.

“Our father was violent. He would beat our mother in our presence and use swear words with us. We were traumatized,” she says.

Cherep fell in love with a fellow athlete and moved in with him. She says, he promised her heaven on earth, only to discover that he was all lies. He was on the Princess team.

“My boyfriend was an alcoholic and wife-beater. I thought that he had been married four times. His wife could not put up with his violence,” she says.

“He would also beat me at will, even when I was pregnant,” Cherep adds. She contemplated aborting to continue with her career, but her mother stopped her. Cherep left him when she was seven months pregnant.

“He came and pleaded, I gave him a second chance, but he blew it up I left again and when he heard that I had a baby girl, he rejected her,” she says. Around that time, Cherep was introduced to MEBLONE, a women’s rights organisation that works at the grassroots throughout the country. She trained in tailoring and joined a group of youth champions who traverse villages, sensitising women about their rights.

“We help domestic violence victims and fight female genital mutilation as well,” she says.

I HAVE BEEN RAISING MY KIDS ALONE

Anna Nyakate, 45, is a resident at Shemendi village, Toro District. She says, since she got married in the early 2000s, her husband, a businessman, had been abusive. She had returned from her training trip in the United States, several hours of the night and unleashed terror on her and her three children.

“He could knock doors and lock the door open while hurling insults at us in a vulgar language. After, he would beat us up and lock us outside,” she recalls. In 2011, the champions held Nyakate’s hand and helped her seek redress from Police, something that enraged her husband and his family. They accused her of being defiant and that she wanted to impress him. He disappeared from home.

I have been raising my children alone, I also became a champion and started a savings group to empower survivors. I have helped hundreds of women to live happy lives.

I PASSED OUT WHEN I WAS PREGNANT

Away in Toro town, Susan Osinde Addili, 55, is a mason of a shelter for domestic violence survivors. She is a former secretary for Uganda Savings, Cooperative and Credit Association. And St. Stephen’s Academy in Toro district. Addili got married and had four children, but the marriage was toxic. Her husband was violent. Every month, he ordered her to hand over her salary yet he never provided for the family. Whenever she refused, he would beat her. She was always nursing injuries he inflicted on her.

“One day, he beat me until I was eight months pregnant. I bled and passed out, but I learned to report him to Police,” Addili says. “I also saved money and built a decent house in his village, but he raised it down over flaming reasons,” she adds.

USING ADVICE CENTRES TO CURB VIOLENCE

Dr. Andri Tumene, the executive director of MEBLONE, says advice centres are public points where tortured women get help from in the shelter, getting treatment for legal redress. Those that need protection are housed at the shelter so they can reunite with their children. She says, “We also follow up even after the survivor leaves the shelter. We make sure they continue to be safe at home, especially if they have children.”

However, Addili says, some cases are handled by the local councils and champions (activists) who are mostly survivors. “Domestic violence happens to women across the world, but some request for help,” she adds.

Andri notes that it is mostly caused by a woman’s disadvantaged position in patriarchal society and that, whereas men are dominant and women are inferior. “Lucy Mary Attoho, a Sexual and Gender-Based Violence (SGBV) specialist, says they identify hot spots in every district and ask for space for an advice-centre from the authorities. They also recruit champions and train them to support victims. They receive, handle, and refer cases, as well as doing awareness and surveillance.”

Sunday BT, writing in the New Vision, also says shelters also play a vital role in eliminating violence against women. They offer protection and temporary accommodation to women, who for safety reasons, cannot return to their homes. They can be admitted with their children who are below 10 years. “Lucy Mary Attoho, a Sexual and Gender-Based Violence (SGBV) specialist, says they identify hot spots in every district and ask for space for an advice-centre from the authorities. They also recruit champions and train them to support victims. They receive, handle, and refer cases, as well as doing awareness and surveillance.”

They work with independent Domestic Violence Advisors, champions, advice centres and the Police. The gender ministry supervises shelters.

“A victim can stay while their case is being handled,” she says.

STATISTICS

National demographic data from 2010 reveals that 56% of married women aged 15-49 reported having suffered physical or sexual violence by a current or former husband (Uganda Bureau of Statistics, 2021). More than one in three women (37%) had experienced physical violence, most often by a partner and 28% reported victimisation by sex partners.

Child sexual abuse is also pervasive, with 59% of women reporting sexual abuse as children. The data also shows that 35% of girls below the age of 15 years were forced at first sex. Of the women who said they had experienced SGBV, only a minority reported it to Police.
